SLEEPING SICKNESS OUTLOOK DOUBTFUL

As we come into the season for equines and other insects thousands of horse owners again be gin to ask themselves the question

Mosquitoes and other insects carry sleeping sickness.

what are the chances for horse sleeping sickness this year, and will MY horse be stricken?

Unfortunately, that is a question that no one is able to answer, because sleeping sickness is now one of the most unpredictable diseases known to veterinary science

However, we are learning more about this baffling and costly disease as time goes on. For one thing, we know that it can be carried not only by mosquitoes, but also by mites, birds, ticks, and numerous forms of insects. We know that birds act as reservoirs for the virus from year to year (and some authorities say that chickens may do the same). And most seriously, the virus of horse sleeping sickness can also kill human beings. In fact, the human cases of this disease now run into the thousands, and there have been many deaths from it.

Instead of just one type of sleeping sickness virus, as at first supposed, veterinarians have now isolated FOUR types—the Eastern strain, the Western, the St. Louis, and the Venezuela. This the problem is further complicated.

The best defense against the disease is to have all horses immunized in the spring, before the insect season begins. If the vaccinating is done properly, the horses can go on working without layoff—and the immunity is usually good for the entire season. It should be pointed out, however, that sleeping sickness vaccination requires a special intra-dermal method involving special techniques and still and must be done properly if firs immunity is to be established.
